School Life.

When I was a little boy, Every morning I went to school. I would have fusses and almost fights; But I would always remember Prof. full. He tried to do the thing that was right. He'd tell us children not to fight. And if we'd fight his blood would boil. He'd baste our backs with a little strap oil. I went to school to a very smart teacher, I know of no one that ever could reach her. She finished her grammar and history. Never did she seem in misery. She was always pleasant and kind to us. And she'd tell us children not to fuss. And some one you know would break her rule, And then they would get suspended from school.

Ira T. Hickman.

My Ideal Girl,

A girl, if she would be my ideal, must undergo an examination unequal to any taken in school. First of all, she must be obedient and benevolent about her home and and to her parents—a beam of light and joy, a household queen. She should be neat and industrious, and keep so well attired that when she hears the door-bell ring, she does not have to rush in order to be prepared to meet them at the door. She must be a good housekeeper, that is, keep her house well arranged that when father or brother comes in late, from work of course, they will not stumble over a fallen chair, or a misplaced cuspidore. She should, or at least I rather she would have, a slight conception of music; she must be well equipped in etiquette; have a vocabulary consisting of many eloquent words, and use them at the proper time and in their proper places. She must be a lady in every sense of the word; void of holding up corners, gossiping on the street, yelling to a boy 3 blocks away, and laughing boisterously. She must respect old age supremely, and give everyone a cause to say that she deserves well the title, lady. She must be dutiful, and not have her mother say "my daughter never sewed a stitch in her life, or she can not make a biscuit; she cannot patch; if she would take a broom to sweep it would blister her hands;" as I have heard so many mothers say. She must know how to play the sewing, or sweeping piano as well as the musical piano. She must do her work well and without procrastination. She must possess every bearing that is an attraction to the eye of an artist, and when any one comes to my studio, and orders a picture representing a house-hold angel, I can conceive an outline of my angel, and let it be the basis of my picture. On the street, she should display grace, dignity, and politeness. I prefer a lady who is admired by other ladies and, demand the respect of the gentlemen.

She must not stay on the street so much that she becomes as common as a sign before a barber shop.

She should put most of her time in at home, and make it admirable to the artistic eye, and when she goes out she must be dressed tastefully. But not have on too much red. This is my "Ideal." If I am dreaming, when I wake up, I will accept A Real.
